Keep Poultry Feed Palatable

Maintaining the feed consumption of chickens during hot summer months is of the utmost importance to the poultry raiser. This is true of growing birds as well as layers since feed intake affects both growth and egg production.

To begin with, birds that are not comfortable will not eat. Therefore, such things as adquate drinking water, a well-ventilated house and plenty of shade are important when it comes to a bird's eating habits. By helping your birds to keep cool you also help to maintain feed intake.

The diet should be nutritious, that is, it should supply the various nutrients in proper proportion to insure birds a well-balanced feeding program. But even a nutritious diet sometimes fails to do a satisfactory job. When this happens, the raiser should check his feeding program for such factors as freshness, palatability and bulkness of feedstuffs.

Fresh Feed

Fresh feed is always more palatable than stale feed. This is particularly important when feeding mash mixtures. Mash remaining in hoppers for several days loses some of its value as a source of vitamin A. On each visit to the flock during the day, stir the mash in the feeders to encourage birds to eat more.

For laying hens, a moist mash fed once a day will often have a beneficial effect. Just moisten the regular mash until it is crumbly (not sloppy) with milk or water. Feed only as much as will be eaten up in about 20 minutes. Noon is a good time to feed this.

Mashes made up of coarsely ground grains for the most part are more palatable than those composed of very finely ground grain. Fine particles frequently stick to the beak and cause trouble. Bulkiness in the diet also tends to aid in the more complete utilization of various nutrients.

Feeding Grit

Feeding of grit is unnecessary for birds on range. However, grit may be desirable for birds reared in confinement. It is important because it enables birds to utilize whole grains and fibrous feedstuffs more efficiently through the grinding action that goes on in the gizzard.

There may be other dietary reasons for a poor-performing flock. Birds sometimes have access to certain plants that are harmful or even poisonous.

There are other plant materials that affect the color of the yolk or the condition of the eggs. Consequently, it isn't difficult to see that besides providing chickens with a well-balanced diet, poultrymen should give some attention to the condition of the feedstuffs used.

ARCHAEOLOGICAL FIND — STIRS UP CONTROVERSY

A young Egyptian delved under the sands beside the Great Pyramid of Giza recently, and came up with what may be the greatest archaeological find in many years.

Emerging from the gloom of a tomb-like excavation, he announced evidence of finiding the rarest known treasures from the era of King Cheops, who lived nearly 5,000 years ago.

The treasure was a funeral "solar boat," perhaps two of them, laden with nautical gear that was supposed to propel the dead Pharaoh Cheops through the heavens day and night in communion with the sun god.

Such "boats" for etheral journeying after death long have been known to Egyptologists. Examples are on display in museums.

But what the young Egyptian excavator saw . . or thought he saw . . has become within a short time a subject of question and controversy among Egyptian experts, both here and abroad. Most of all, they urge caution in prejudicing what will finally be turned up and they warn against hasty digging that might destroy objects than can throw light on life and death 50 centuries ago.

Nothing has yet been removed or closely examined at the excavation.

The discoverer is 32-year-old Kamal el Mallakh , director of excavations at Giza, site of the great Pyramid of Cheops and two imposing but lesser pyramids, and the nearby Sphynx.

They are the No. 1 tourist attractions of Cairo, a few minutes drive from the heart of the city.

Dragoman and camel holsters explain in almost any language you require that vandals looted the treasures of Cheops centuries ago: the crypts in the pyramids are dusty and bare.

El Mallakh was not satisfied that the riddle of Cheops was solved by the vandals. He had his workmen crack into the sea of sand and made his announcement suggesting the biggest discovery since the opening of King Tut-Ankh-Amen's tomb in 1922. Tut's was the first tomb found to have escaped visits by grave-robbers.

After El Mallakh's announcement museum curators over the world began their speculation and words of caution about drawing conclusions until the evidence was all laid open. El Mallakh's report that there was still a sharp aroma of cypress wood from the boat's planking was doubted by an American expert. He contended that perfume would not have lasted 5,000 years. Others commented hopefully, but with reserve.

Nothing is more important in home laundering than rinsing. Soapsuds must be out.
